Position: Technical Support Engineer (Level 1)

The Organisation

Animal Health Ireland is a not-for-profit, public-private partnership, tasked with controlling livestock diseases not subject to international regulation, with the objective of improving the profitability and sustainability of Irish farmers and the agri-food sector. The advice provided by AHI is developed by a number of Technical Working Groups and the delivery of its major programmes is overseen by cross-industry Implementation Groups.

Description

The successful candidate will support and assist the IT Project Manager across a range of functions including supporting the development and maintenance of AHI's customer relationship management system, problem solving technical issues with different components of computer systems, such as software, hardware and other network-related IT related problems, assisting with project building and providing programme summary reports as required.

Candidate requirements

The candidate must be highly motivated, well organised and committed to delivering high-quality results with good interpersonal, communication and analytical skills. The ability to multi-task and work effectively with flexibility as part of a team are key requirements also. A sound technical IT background is required with a familiarity with programme languages HTML, CSS and JavaScript. Knowledge and experience of working with Microsoft suite of products at an advanced level, accounting software and customer relationship management (CRM)/database systems are required. Experience with end user development would be a distinct advantage.

Educational Requirements

A degree in Information Technology or computer science is a requirement.
